Human leukocyte antigen DRB3*1501 and pneumonia in nursing home residents with Alzheimer's disease. Previous studies have suggested that the human leukocyte antigen (HLA) DRB3*1501 allele is associated with an increased risk of pneumonia in elderly populations with normal cognitive function. The purpose of this study was to investigate whether the association between HLA-DRB3*1501 and pneumonia is also present in the elderly with Alzheimer's disease (AD). Subjects were elderly people living in nursing homes (N = 252), and controls were healthy, well-nourished nursing home residents (N = 205). There were a total of 98 subjects diagnosed with AD, 56 of whom developed pneumonia. We found that subjects who have AD and pneumonia had significantly higher frequencies of HLA-DRB3*1501 than did AD subjects without pneumonia (P = .027). In addition, using a univariate logistic regression model, the probability of AD with pneumonia was also significantly associated with HLA-DRB3*1501 (P = .029). However, the HLA-DRB3*1501 was not associated with pneumonia after adjustment for age, sex, and other HLA-DRB3*01 alleles. Results of the logistic regression model demonstrated that after adjusting for age, sex, dementia rating scale, and other HLA-DRB3*01 alleles, the association between pneumonia and HLA-DRB3*1501 was no longer statistically significant (P = .058).
